GRIEF AND STUFF BRING EMOTIONS

– Sharon Fischman,
Empty The Nest

It is difficult to witness a parent's decline due to memory loss. It is also challenging to sell or move their belongings due to their passing. The situation can quickly become emotionally complicated.

Gary was an only child. He lived in Chicago as a lawyer. His mother was a single mom who had worked full time to provide the best for her son. Gary's mother was diagnosed with dementia after management of her bills, medications and home were in disarray. Gary arranged for home care services; however, following her rapid escalation of dementia and ultimate passing, Gary had to empty the home where he grew up and his mother lived for 65 years.

Contacting an estate sale company, Gary was told he did not have enough for a sale. Charities said they would only take or pick up certain items but he had to deliver them. The trash company would provide a dumpster – but who would load it?

The emotions of losing his mother and going through his childhood home was overwhelming until he heard that a clean-out company could empty his mother's home with respect and compassion. Items would be donated to charity, recycled or sold.

With professional help, the house emptied quickly and Gary was able to detach himself from the sentiments of the home and experience great relief.
